

Hey, guys, we're all good out here with regulating ISPs under Title II of the Communications Act.

ISPs have a market because they provide two-way access to a vast universe of information which they neither create nor pay for. It's not in their best interest, or that of a self-governing republic, to allow them to block traffic or give priority to Web content providers in exchange for payment. They must continue to operate as common carriers.

The genius of the Internet is that it's a communications channel for all voices and all content. Please don't screw it up by reversing net neutrality enforcement that's working just fine of us consumers.
